

Just an idea, maybe this is why

Suppose there was a God, then we would have to ask some fundamental questions!

The first issue or question that we could have for God is why he thinks we should worship him?

Suppose that it was God that created us; why did he create us?

Humans create stuff too, and all of these productions have one major factor in common: to serve us and make our lives easier; we make tables and desks that can be of service to us. We create smartphones that we can use for many convenient reasons. Everything that we make and produce is an item to serve us somehow, to make us more comfortable and content physically or mentally.

However, why did God create us? Are we of any service to him? Is it the reason that he created us? The same reason that we create anything else! Nevertheless, what services could we possibly offer God or the Gods? Besides, we create stuff for more comfort and convenience. We keep producing new things because it is never enough. After all, we are imperfect entities with limited power and knowledge striving for perfection or attempting to reach that perfect life that anything we want, we could have!

How about the Gods? What was their intention for our creation? Moreover, was it because they needed our services? After all, they cannot take care of themselves? or is it because they too strive for perfection?

Suppose we are here to serve God as a purpose of living on this planet, as we argued previously. What kind of services could we possibly offer to the all-powerful God?

What services are there that the gods need us to do for them? Why can't they get it done on their own? Do they need us more than we need them?

We create things to serve us. Like the pen that I am using right now, I need the pen to write, but the pen does not need me! We make cars for commuting, and we need cars, but the cars do not need us! Is this the same relation that we have with God? He created us to serve him because he needs us, and we do not need him, the same as the pen and the car?

However, we know how a pen or a car can serve us, but what services could we offer God? Moreover, does God need us, or do we need him?

Some may claim that God created us to assist each other on this planet! Okay, fair enough, but why wouldn't God make all people the same. In the same condition and situation that no one would require others' help, besides what kind of service would that be to a God? We can be assuming since God wants all humans to be happy, equal, and satisfied! However, if he cared that much about our welfare, why didn't he create us all equal unless God could not do it himself, and he needed us to do it for him!

Some say that God created us to serve him. Okay, but can someone tell us what services we could offer to an omnipotent and an omniscient God? The all-powerful who is allegedly perfect and can ideally create perfection? All the services that we heard of God commanding us were giving our money to him, serving him, and worshiping him.

Every planned product, let them be dead or alive, has at least one distinct purpose for its creation in common: to perform a task of some sort. However, we know why we build computers. We need our computers to serve us! Now imagine that we build computers that can decide for themselves if they want to serve us or not! When we need the computer the most, we try to turn it on, and a message appears on the screen, saying 'not today,!'

Would we honestly create something that could decide if it wants to serve us or not? So then why did God give us the option to choose if we like to serve him or not?

Imagine grabbing a pen to write, and the pen decides to get a day off! Wouldn't that be an inconvenient and stupid design? If we have been created to serve, why do we have an option to decide if we should or not? Not to mention what services could we possibly offer and whom are we going to offer it?

It is unlikely for a mighty God to be that irrational to create humans to worship him; thank him for our creation! If our creation is of no service to God directly or indirectly, except for worshiping him, thanking him, and begging him for all we want! We would have to question Gods' self-confidence, egocentricity, and foolishness.

Imagine we can build robots to serve us, and then we decide to build them to worship and thank us every day for their creation. Moreover, every minute they want something from us just as we pray to God for all we want; besides, the robots could decide for themselves if they want to worship us or not? We cannot even force them to do so.

Even if worshiping us was the primary purpose of creating robots, then why give them the power to choose for themselves whether to obey us or not. It is like God building us to obey him, but he gives us the power to decide. It does not comfortably sit well by most accounts! Maybe we can threaten the robots as Gods threaten us with the fire of hell, and we can tell the robots that if they do not worship us, they will end up in fire after they are dead and out of service.

However, the creation of such robots that do not obey us is so absurd. All they do is worship us, and all they want, they ask us to get it for them as we ask God for all we want. Then why the hell even create them? It seems that we created robots that we can serve, not the other way around that robots should be serving us!

Maybe our purpose of being created is nothing more than the creation of any other animal! Maybe our purpose and reason for creation are the same as the point of origin, which is nothing but fire.

What if the only purpose was to burn oxygen and produce carbon dioxide? Maybe our purpose on this planet is no different from dogs, cats, birds, or even trees.

We are just here to burn oxygen and produce carbon. Maybe our purpose is the point of origin which is fire! Humankind is the closest thing to a fire pit; a fire pit needs food such as wood or petro, we too need food such as vegetables or meat. Fire needs oxygen and releases back carbon, and so do we. We both need heat or spark to live or to start anyhow! Additionally, both fire and humans can enlighten, or the same as fire can burn us. Humans are the same; we can be good and create goodness, or we can be destructive and create evil.

Maybe the whole purpose of creation was to speed up eliminating oxygen. To achieve that, we all need to do our part by only being alive and breathing. Maybe there are absolutely no other reasons for our creation and animals alike except for breathing.

Our creation could ensure that the planet runs out of oxygen by breathing and perhaps an ultimate fire that would suck all the oxygen and burn all trees. The only obstacle to that would be water. As humans can drown in water and die, so does fire. The sign of life may not be water but rather fire, maybe since it could enlighten us and keep us warm or could also burn us or even eliminate us. Fire is what brought people together, and water divides the lands into continents and separates people.
