

super-Retributivism

a criminal should suffer more than their victim an earlier version is posted at reddit/r/philosophy, with additional dialogue

two accounts of punishment:

A. pure Retributivism: criminal C deserves to suffer a harm equal to the harm that C has inflicted on victim V.

B. super-Retributivism: criminal C deserves to suffer an injustice: a harm greater than the harm that C inflicted on V.

yet this "extra" harm is, on fuller accounting, deserved - thus is not actually excessive:

p1. by Retributivism, the Criminal's suffering ought to equal the Victim's suffering.

p2. the Victim suffered an injustice.¹

c. by Retributivism, the Criminal ought to suffer an injustice.

¹ if they justly suffered, then they weren't victimized: it wasn't a crime to have harmed them.

the victim suffers an injustice - not just x amount of pain.

V's suffering typically increases [e.g. is complexified & intensified] by their realization that their suffering was undeserved. they suffer the pain e.g. of losing their family home, then suffer from the realization that their home in fact was stolen from them through the financial chicanery of a trusted advisor.

the violation of V's innocence is an outrage, i.e. we suffer the passion of anger when we comprehend the violation. our anger is righteous: our anger correctly tracks the objective moral reality that V's suffering is undeserved.

thus the "extra" punishment inflicted on C in fact completes the punishment. the "extra" punishment - call it the super-punishment portion of the total punishment - renders the total punishment super-just: the total punishment is strictly more than deserved, therefore ultimately deserved.²

² i think it is part of the suffering of Hell that it is undeserved. we shouldn't imagine our demon tormentors as measured dispensers of pain. released into their chamber we're released into their unrestrained sadism. we'd suffer many lifetimes-worth of agony - & this undeserved torture would be super-just, if we - like our demons - had done as we pleased to creatures we should have been stewards over.

a point about p1

notice i didn't write "by Retributivism, the Criminal's suffering ought to be identical with the Victim's suffering." that's an impossible demand, and an Ought implies a Can.

impossible because - most formally - C's suffering can't be V's suffering, thus can't be identical to V's suffering. V's suffering is V's.

response 1 to super-Retributivism

s-R is the true Retributivism, the pure Retributivism. pure Retributivism requires that the punishment fit the crime. yet the crime was an injustice. thus the punishment, too, must be formally unjust, excessive.

super-justice is true justice.

response 2 to super-Retributivism

s-R is self-contradictory. it is a putative account of just punishment that demands we punish unjustly.

response 3 to super-Retributivism

s-R implies an endless regress of punishments. s-R demands that we punish C more than C deserves, so that C, like V, suffers an injustice. thus in the course of their punishment, C, like V, shall be victimized. thus the punisher, P, will now deserve to be punished. but the proper punishment against P should be super-just: more than, strictly, P deserves. thus the punisher of P deserves to be punished - and so on, endlessly.

also, s-R implies that C should be infinitely punished. according to s-R, the super-Punishment portion of C's punishment is, in the fuller accounting, totally deserved. but s-R demands that we give C more punishment than they deserve. thus s-R demands that we inflict a third portion of punishment - call it the super-super-Punishment - on C. but then, it seems, the super-super-Punishment will have been totally deserved. thus we ought to inflict a fourth portion of Punishment upon C, and so on. by whatever increment, C's total deserved punishment is infinite.

response 3 perhaps doesn't imply that s-R is incorrect. perhaps an exclusively punitive response to crime indeed unleashes an endless sequence of harms - both from Criminal outward to Punishers, and upon the Criminal.

perhaps s-R is the correct account of punishment because it correctly reduces punishment to absurdity, to a regress impossible to complete.

perhaps s-R is the correct account of punishment, but something like forgiveness / mercy need enter into our response to crime, to stop the regress.

we never deserve forgiveness / mercy - it issues from considerations outside of justice.