Bridford Cokelt
Remember, compassion is a form of insight and food-will-employed responsibility. This means that when we try to make decisions about the actions we are about to take, we need to consider how those decisions will affect others. This requires us to be sensitive to the needs and feelings of those around us.

In addition, compassion is not just about feeling sorry for others. It is also about taking action to help them. This is why compassion is often described as a moral virtue. It is something that we can choose to cultivate in our own lives, and it is something that we can pass on to future generations.

In summary, compassion is a powerful force that can help us to make better decisions and to live more fulfilling lives. By developing our compassion, we can create a more just and caring world for all.

It is important to note that the distinction between emotion-focused non-moral compassion, the reason, and moral compassion is not always clear.
