

Review of: "[Commentary] Biology as a postmodern science: Universals, historicity, and context"

Alessio Gava

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

As other reviewers have already commented, philosophers of biology have long stressed the peculiarity of biology, when compared to other sciences, especially physics and chemistry. Still, I am not sure that this offers biology a unique connection with the postmodern stance, more profound than the connections other sciences could establish. It might even be the case, but the author should put forward more consistent arguments in order to convince the reader. I am afraid that a physicist or a chemist could write a paper along the same lines about their own field of study though.
