Abstract: Ion Dur is an authentic scholar. His working methods, his interest and freshness of his discourse are placing him among the active contemporary Romanian philosophers and critics. Among the constant coordinates of his work are the attempt to guide readers "towards the North point of value". Ion Dur distinguishes himself by depth of his analysis on culture, criticism and journalism. The aim of this study is to offer, to young researchers and others as well, an Ariadne's Thread to the hermeneut's work. In preparation of this article, extensive documentation was made and most diverse sources have been used in order to illustrate the author's ideas and to highlight the warm reception of his writings. Among others, in 1995, the essayist has re-established Sæculum, a journal founded by Lucian Blaga, in 1943, coordinated by Ion Dur for 20 years. We are writing this article in honorem to a scholar and an university Professor who this year climbed onto the seventieth step of his life.

Keywords: Ion Dur; philosophy; critic; media, forewords; update; idea; reception; Eminescu; Noica; Cioran;

Introduction

Ever since his debut (1981) and up to this year's fresh books¹, Ion Dur distinguishes himself by rigorousness, by the depth of his analyses and by his incessant interrogation on yesterday's and today's philosophy, culture, journalism and criticism. However, he has also dedicated long time to the study of the interwar philosophy and journalism. Andrei Terian observes that Ion Dur's affinities with Noica and Cioran were decisive in influencing the critic's construction of hermeneutic discourse. He identifies three aspects that define Mr. Dur’s essay writing, whether speaking of his monographic studies, or of his other volumes. The exegete's interpretive construction is characterised by “the programmatic oscillation between literature, journalism and philosophy” and is “embodied in a bipolar écriture, in which the aulic and sapiential register (via Noica) intersects with its polemic and sarcastic counterpart (via Cioran)”3, to which the “fragmentarism of the approach” should be added. On broadening the framework of these considerations, we will add another trait emerged from the best symbiosis of history, criticism and philosophy.

Along with these interpretive, structural and stylistic peculiarities, the books of philosopher Ion Dur are jolting the readers out of the cosiness of prejudice, and placing them onto a trajectory of objective judgements, leaving them the possibility to feel and live “the authenticity of their own reading”4. His high-level essayist profile was beginning to take contour even before his publishing debut, when he attempted at critically deconstructing the being of culture, by means of texts published in the specialized journals from all over the country. Thus, the variety of themes and perspectives of interpretation shed light from very early on over his hermeneutic itinerary and the complexity of his approaches. Referring to this period of creation, critic Ilie Guțan said that “Ion Dur proves an increased propensity for confrontations of opinion, for debates, reflection, essay writing, and the published texts were recommending him, even before they became bundled in a book, as an analytical, dissociative, rather meticulous spirit, nimble and knowledgeable, a careful judge of arguments and counter-arguments to prove of the Other’s ideational system works”5.

For these reasons, it should not surprise us that Ion Dur frequently returns to authors to whom he earlier dedicated lengthy studying. His grounding principle is that of updating, which is a particularity to a philosopher, and, also, to one who is a specialist in communication. Those who have interpreted the work of Ion Dur have noted the fact that the hermeneut is permanently aspiring to achieve completeness. His returns to certain authors or ideas are accompanied by critical re-evaluations. Therefore, his philosophical construction is in a continuous process of development. Andrei Terian notes that fragments and chapters “often migrate from one book to another, leaving the impression of an incessant work in progress”.

“Exercises of recognition”. Noica – the journalist philosopher

Ion Dur is the author of research acclaimed by critics and public ever since its beginning. In the following lines we will highlight a few aspects that critics have discovered in the philosopher’s books along time. Dan-Silviu Boerescu identifies at the author of Exerciții de recunoaștere [Exercises of Recognition] the quality and consistency of documentation\(^6\), in a foucaultian spirit: “Foucault is very dear to Ion Dur and... not in vain. [...] He yearns to establish an archive of bookish signs, axiologically and often even eulogistically delineated”\(^7\).

Although, it generally focuses on the analysis of Romanian philosophy, the research of Ion Dur is the fruit of beautiful hermeneutic autochtonous and universal connections. Sălăvăstru notes that “the invocation of names of reference of the Romanian culture” is doubled by “references to the European critical and philosophical literature”\(^8\). With this essayist, his technique of re-reading the work of renowned Romanian thinkers is also to be appreciated. The truly in-depth probing of the Romanian culture begins with the work of “the most complete man of Romanian culture” – Mihai Eminescu. In the reading and interpretation of Ion Dur, Eminescu’s thinking unveils new meanings, and a whole different version of Eminescu is being presented to the reader. C. Cubleșan was ascertaining that the essayist feels “always the need for broadening in height and profundity of our philosophical understanding of the most remarkable innovative spirit in our national culture”\(^9\), which trait is also to be found in his subsequent writings.

From the intense research on Eminescu’s thinking, Ion Dur switched to the similarly intense study of Noica’s thinking, that he had been focusing on ever since 1985, on the occasion of reviewing the book Trei introducerei la Devenirea întru ființă [Three Introductions to the Becoming into Being], of which he said it was “the inroad to the core of his work, it is the author’s coming back, with the intent of revealing us the entrances. Yet, the study can ultimately be a false introduction as well, since all three texts are speaking independently about being”\(^10\). To Noica, whose discreet disciple he was, Ion Dur has grown to become culturally connected, ultimately coming to dedicate considerable studies to this author.

In 1994, the essayist published a book\(^\text{11}\) with a new perspective, about the thinker from Paltinis (Noica). Ilie Guțan states that Noica – între dandysm și mitul școlii [Noica between Dandyism and the Myth of School] “is a book born from a double impulse, of admiration for the author man and of support for his work”\(^\text{12}\). Dan C. Mihăilescu characterises the essay as being “A serious, didactic work, crafted without pathos and grandiloquence, and with skills of a philosopher who is not downplaying the history of literature”\(^\text{13}\).

By reading Noica’s early works from \textit{inside}, one is being revealed “the coordinates of his livresque and existential adventure”\(^\text{14}\). This study was bringing additional knowledge and revealed Noica’s breaking free from the captivity of narrow interpretations, by displaying one first impression of the interwar \textit{journalist} and in part also of the thinker. The author does not wish to “close” the case, but rather to offer new data and clues to be used for further research. Our exegete, as Vasile Avram was pointing out, “reads Noica through himself, or more precisely through the self that had grown inside him, from his long-time hovering over the man and the work that he had chosen as a model for his own spiritual adventure”\(^\text{15}\).

Ion Dur is keeping Noica’s life and writings in the permanent focus of his attention. The second book appeared in 1999, with the title Noica – Portretul gazetarului la tinerețe [Portrait of the Gazetteer in his Youth], as part of “a broader process of research of the Romanian interwar thinking – and the re-signification of its value – a process both necessary and difficult [...] by removing the interference of ideology with the syllogisms of interpretation”\(^\text{16}\), a successful enterprise from a “political and philosophical”\(^\text{17}\) perspective, that in deciphering of Heidegger’s political ontology has applied the grid test developed by Pierre Bourdieu.

between Dandyism and the Myth of School] (2009) “synthesizes and re-writes the two prior books, adding two sections on the Romanian thinker’s reference to Aristotle and Kant”\(^{18}\), as Andrei Terian notices in the Dicționarul general al literaturii române [General Dictionary of Romanian Literature]. This merger of prior works is performed by its author effortlessly, since it is a spin-off of the natural conjunction of those dimensions that speak not only of the philosopher, but also the man Constantin Noica.

About Nae Ionescu and his rebellious disciple

Once again, Ion Dur is behind one remarkable addition to the general efforts of revisiting ideas of a few interwar philosophers, this time with a book in which the “heroes” are Nae Ionescu, mentor of the generation of the 30’s, and Emil Cioran, the rebellious disciple. Our essayist analyses the philosophic doctrine of Nae Ionescu, who has accomplished a “socratic mission in understanding the essence of the Romanian soul from an ontological angle”\(^{19}\), and samples the factors determining his philosophical construction, strongly sustained by the theological factor, that will “vertebrate his metaphysical vision”\(^{20}\). By judging Nae Ionescu’s contribution with much sense of balance, the essayist Ion Dur, as Dan C. Mihăilescu states, belongs to the few exegetes that have an “interpretive common sense”\(^{21}\).

Concerning Emil Cioran, the hermeneut Dur defines the philosopher as “a dyoniscian with the voluptuousness of doubt”\(^{22}\), “which changes quite much the interpretation”\(^{23}\) of his writings. In the same book, the exegete offers the readers an extensive chapter containing “the first writing trials of the young man of 17-18 years”\(^{24}\), and later of the student and the graduate in philosophy Emil Cioran.

On commenting Hîrtia de turnesol [The Litmus Paper] Mihaela-Gențiana Stânișor noted that the author was imposing his research perspective, packed with an ethical system of its own: “Ion Dur has succeeded in meandering skilfully through the prior demonstrations of so many other researchers of Cioran’s work, sometimes distancing himself from these and imposing his own research perspective, by avoiding the malevolent illusion of the existence of a double for the Cioranian style, that could emerge inside a meta-text. The author is proving that being faithful towards another author’s text (whether this other may be Nae Ionescu or Emil Cioran) is, in fact, being faithful towards oneself”25.

Marin Diaconu was noting that Ion Dur is one of the most serious interpreters of Nae Ionescu’s school of thought. Even more, the researcher stated that the author “is at the height of his philosophical virtues”, and the work about Nae Ionescu and Emil Cioran “remains a work of reference in the history of Romanian philosophy”26. In the same vein, Gheorghe Grigurcu sustains that Hîrtia de turnesol [The Litmus Paper] is “a book that is interesting, inciting to the intellect, I would say through its very common sense, that sometimes takes a taste of polemic”27.

Later, Ion Dur “will separate” Cioran from Nae Ionescu, and dedicate an entire book to the first, with the title Cioran. Conform cu originalul [Cioran. According to the Original] (2016), which was translated into English and will be published at Vernon Press (2019) under the title Cioran – A Dyonisiac with the Voluptuousness of Doubt; this edition closes with a chapter from Schimbarea la față a României, “Collectivism național” [Romania’s Transfiguration. National Collectivism], that Cioran had taken out from the edition published by Humanitas in 1990, yet Ion Dur is putting it back in circulation, “against the author’s will”, yet “just like the original”28, that is, painstakingly confronted with the version from the book’s manuscript, that was miraculously found in the archive of Aurel Cioran.

Between caryatidies and contemporaries

The register of Ion Dur’s work is manifold. On reading his writings, one can distinguish such postures as critic, essayist, philosopher, professor and journalist. Being intensely active, and always present in cultural debates, “in-forming” generations of high-school and university students for decades, Ion Dur emerged as a critic that has reinstated order where there was hermeneutic chaos, he has kept alive the spirit of reasoning and became involved in opening new horizons in the knowledge of the human spirit’s workings. Ion Dur has broadened his research by help of a prolific pendulation between philosophy, criticism, history, literature, journalism and communication.

After his exercises of “re-knowing” (hyphen placed on purpose), and along with his ample work De la Eminescu la Cioran [From Eminescu to Cioran], still within the framework of Romanianism that “is not discussed”, but “affirmed”, Ion Dur proposes a renewed debate on the salvaging the idea of Romanian “identity, or cultural and spiritual individuality” from a trivial destiny. On focusing around certain «synapses» of the Romanian culture, simply called Eminescu or Maiorescu, Motru or Camil Petrescu, Noica or Cioran and around the coordinates of the Romanian spirit, the exegete passes the national treasure of philosophic thinking, excruciatingly crafted amidst confrontations between the old and the new schools of thought, through the crucible of his own scientific thinking.

The freshness and “the interpreter’s participative enthusiasm”, not only in this book “are not estranging the reader, on the contrary, they are stirring and keeping them alert”. His theorisations are emerged in discursive vitality, allowing shelter in the book’s cradle solely to the long-distance readers. The authors analysed by Ion Dur possess at least one double vocation, “they have practised both the literary and the philosophic discourse”. In his ideas, the essayist is not anchored in the past only, but also in contemporary realms. Daniel Deleanu promoted the idea that Ion Dur, “by the minuteness of observation and his analytic rafinesse” of the last section of De la Eminescu la Cioran [From Eminescu to Cioran], “is overtaking H.R. Patapievici in Politice”. Remarkable as well is the book’s last essay, “De la perfectul simplu la perfectul (des)compus” [From Simple Perfect to (De)Composed Perfect Tense], of which Ion Militaru says “It is perhaps, the most beautiful and true thing ever written about Oltenians [population living in the south of Romania, whose speaking mannerisms contain the preference for the simple perfect tense].”

From one book to the next, research becomes more and more enticing, and the critic takes his role more seriously, as he is doing in the book

Cariatide of which we have written some time ago\textsuperscript{36}. We will revisit certain ideas below. The book opens forcefully, warning about “the dangers of a revue stage culture” in a time when the press and criticism seemed to be in free fall. In Ion Dur’s opinion, journalists were becoming more and more “deprived of a prolific cultural horizon”\textsuperscript{37}, while critics were stalled within the issue of “canonisation”, which led to a “surrogate culture and a decayed journalism”\textsuperscript{38}. Due to universities being swamped by utilitarianism and subdue to the realm of economy, and also to residual communist mentalities, the professor notes with sadness that in Romania, philosophy is being downplayed by the very institutions that ought to defend it: “I feel that in today’s state of philosophy in Romanian language, one backlash can be attributed to a hostile context coming from the very institutions. I do not know precisely how much the prejudices towards philosophy, that the Romanian high-school has cultivated with persistence, have been overcome, but the backlog of Marxist judgement filters concerning the role of philosophy still persist in many academic environments. Ideologization or politization have led to straightforward attitudes of rejection towards this discipline, that many have mistaken – and are still mistaking – for the [Communist] party’s instruction ordeal. This resistance to philosophy is at the same time often embodied in manifestations of lazy thinking, used to “ precooked” treats, worshipping instant reading experiences, and to which culture comes from the revue stage, or is like chewing gum and \textit{fast food}”\textsuperscript{39}.

The critic was also noticing other deviations, manifested through various forms of “resistance”: against essay, against academic activity of excellence, against culture and against authentic journalism. He is in literal combat, fighting like a soldier. By using his spear of critical judgement, Ion Dur is resetting the hermeneutics of writings of some prime size authors of the Romanian culture and of phenomena that have determined the progress of Romanian thinking, in the contexts of the critical spirit of Maiorescu, the “new spirituality” and interwar Europeanisation. Among the analysed authors are Maiorescu, Iorga, Caragiale, Eminescu, Goga, Eliade, Vulcănescu, Cioran, S. Tudor, Lucian Blaga and Noica. In the section “Lancea lui Dorifor”\textit{[Dorifor’s Spear]}, the critic welcomes debutants like Lucian Groza (analysed in the first part), Răzvan Enache, Minodora Sălcudean, Mihaela-Genţiana Stănişor, Mihai Barbu (Posada) and Victoria Murărescu. Several pages of critique are dedicated to consecrated authors, mostly from Sibiu, such as: Rodica Braga, Adrian Niţă, Ileana Marinescu, Dumitru Chioaru, Ion Radu Văcărescu, Andrei Ileni and the painter Mugur Pascu. The final part, titled Jurnal de in-formator [The Notes of an In-Form-er] deliberately offers the readers an occasion to delve into the author’s universe of ideas.

On commenting upon the book, Răzvan Enache appreciates “the well-controlled pendulation between irony and sarcasm”\(^40\), and Sorin Lavric emphasizes the commentator’s sense of balance: “the author has neither bouts of liking, nor outbursts of disliking towards the authors he comments upon. His writing bears the same colour as its author’s temperament: balanced, sanguine and moderate”\(^41\).

In the same register of discursive harmonisation are placed the views of Andrei Terian: “[...] the author’s ideological astrogram presupposes a rare conjunction, materialised in the alliance between the critical spirit proper to Maiorescu-Lovinescu, and the constructive pathos of Eliade & Co., but also of the followers of the Gandirea-movement. In other words, Ion Dur is still enthusiastic enough to avoid the scepticism of the former, yet sober enough in order not to fall into the latter’s mystic delirium.”\(^42\).

_Maculatorul cu spirală [The Spiral Notebook]_ (2010) continues in the same interpretive pattern and is, like _Cariatide [Caryatides]_, structured in three parts, with the final one containing again diary pages. Along with some new studies, Ion Dur also includes in his book a few texts written before 1989, yet “equal in aesthetic rights”\(^43\). On authentic pages, his investigations are focused on literary and philosophic contributions of a few representative figures of the Romanian culture, like Eminescu, Blaga, Rebreanu, Noica, Fundoianu, R. Braga, C. Antonea, I. Vultur, Rădulescu-Motru, M. Sorescu, L. Raicu, A. Codoban, A. Ileni, Doina Graur and Adam Müller-Guttenbrunn. In the second chapter, Ion Dur makes theoretical stints on issues within conceptual, ideational, political and academic convergences and divergences, like: identity / alterity, new speakers / new babblers, Noica between the West, the East and Păltiniş, nationalism viewed as symbolic violence and, with ironical accents, the specific difference between philosophy and ... tinkering.

\(^42\) Andrei Terian, „În contra culturii de estradă“ [“Against a Revue Stage Culture”], _Ziarul de Duminică_, 14 octombrie 2008.

Silviu Guga was discovering a unique trait of this work, in the fact that, even more than in the previous ones, Ion Dur reveals himself as a narrator as well, particularly in the personal diary fragments: “Prose, as we suspect, might be his second calling, perhaps to the surprise of some. The fictional dimension of his book is quite evident, particularly in the last section, in which Ion Dur proves to be a very subtle diarist, sometimes nostalgic, sometimes ironic, always preoccupied to «glorify or rehabilitate the trivia, the simple joys, things that come second»”\textsuperscript{44}.

In 2012, Ion Dur published \textit{Ciorne și zile [Drafts and Days]}, an anthology of 16 texts, all having been published before in the last two decades, all essays that he “arranged in a chronological order of publication”\textsuperscript{45}. Along with these, the author added in the end, in form of a “cyclopic afterword”, all forewords of his books, together with a few pages from a file of critical references. In this book, the author proposes his selection of texts, analysing works of writers such as: L. Blaga, C. Noica, M. Eminescu, N. Ionescu, E. Cioran, T. Maiorescu, I.L. Caragiale, O. Goga and M. Vulcănescu, Dan C. Mihăilescu.

This collection, described by Sorin Lavric as being a possible “interior anthology”\textsuperscript{46} of the philosopher Ion Dur, has created a frame for discussions, leading commentators to highlighting qualities of his spirit of criticism. Răzvan Enache stated the following: “Perhaps this publishing event could be one good occasion for the author to occupy a well-established position. And we confess of having often thought, which this position could be, or what position it aspires to occupy among the other writers. From one book to another, we have been waiting for clues, yet only now can be seen that, in opposition with other commentators who employ a very naive approach to the encounters within the space of culture, pretending to be either friends or adversaries of the great minds, Ion Dur prefers to soar above it all. He sees everything, without being radar detectable, like a stealth plane; he limits himself to making observations, although he could very well bomb the targets; he likes to perform loops in the air, and does not yearn for applause.”\textsuperscript{47}.

Concerning the discursive vitality of Ion Dur the critic, Constantin M. Popa stated that, from the 1992 debut and up to \textit{Ciorne și zile [Drafts and Days]}, the exegete “has in no way lowered the enthusiasm of his writing, or the wingspan of his ideas, on the contrary, he has amplified that pathos of distance that the author is invoking, on following”⁴⁸.

The space of media: impenetrable to culture

The repositioning in its due rights of criticism and culture in its own vital frames has become for Ion Dur a true credo, although the frequent warnings about the crisis of criticism and that of culture, occupy significant spaces in his books. On a deeper judgement of things, this appears as a natural reaction, even if by its deliberate repetition, it grows into obsession, just like in Cel de-al treilea sens [The Third Meaning] (2014): “I have lately mediated, more than a few times on the so controversial usefulness of critical exercise (that can not be conceived without an organic philosophical background), and on its proportion within the (re)construction of the act of culture and in the authority with which it constitutes, in agreement with a certain saeculum, the table of values (and of re-evaluations) of a specific field (in a physical Meaning) of the spirit”⁴⁹.

The critic deplores the fact that for over two decades the space of media has been impenetrable to culture, and the consequences on the public are truly disastrous. With a reference to the cultural offer coming from the media, and also to the redoubtable study of Giovanni Sartori⁵⁰, the critic notes that a favourable medium is being created, leading to an undeniable stultification through television, which gives birth to a “surrogate culture”.

Therefore, Ion Dur insists on stating that: “For great many, culture is unfortunately very much limited to a surrogate of media culture, which makes out of homo (s)zapiens a hybrid concoction, with a precarious vocabulary and random grammar, mostly predisposed to analogic forms of communication. Criticism is one among the reasons for this undesirable evolution, a field otherwise bearing recognized authority before the Revolution, yet having for some good time been abandoned to undeserved chaos”⁵¹.

In the same vein, the “hocus-pocus” of critical stunt turns criticism into a magic trick, and the only solution for it to regain its prestige stands in its aesthetic re-establishment by those who are true critics: “More than ever do we need the critic, and not some kind of cabaret impersonator, we need the one who can irrevocably shoo away the virus of value promiscuity and who, standing somewhere on the high ledger of aesthetic evaluation, and owning unique knowledge, can reach to what we could call the The Third Meaning.”

The essay Cel de-al treilea sens [The Third Meaning] bring into the forefront the discourse of a few creators that our exegete does not cease to (re)-read: Eminescu, Blaga, Vulcănescu, Noica and Cioran. In the other writings, the essayist extends his reflections on Romanianism, scholars, politics (generously evoking here the contribution of Viorella Manolache) and the press, while in the final section – “Varia (Racursiuri)” [Miscellanea – Raccourcies] is mentioned Romul Munteanu. Also present there are commentaries on books by Mihaela Andreescu or Princess Margareta of Romania; here again, discreetly, a few pages of diary are inserted, giving insights on some of his personality traits.

The book (that earned the “Mircea Florian” Prize for philosophy of the Romanian Academy) was received as a “multiple-faceted perspective on the Romanian cultural phenomenon”; upon the deciphering of its message, we must retain the following, just like Adrian Niță did: “This The Third Meaning, added to the second meaning, that of the reader, and to the prime meaning, belonging to the author himself, is the very one that strengthens culture and, along with it, the entire society.”

The Kantian sense of the judgement of taste

We were once saying that “since his debut (1981) up to this day, Ion Dur has been among those who have permanently taken the pulse of culture and have imposed the yardstick values” with much perseverance. In a similar line of thought lies Critica judecății de gust [Criticism of Taste Judgement] (2018), a work focusing on “two complementary ways to approach a work of art: the judgement of value (soft) and the judgement of taste (hard)” [Journalistic Writings of a Balkan Troublemaker], “Lecturi și interpretări” [Readings and Interpretations] and “Ciorne de jurnal domestic. Zilele după Iou” [Drafts of a Domestic Diary. Days after Job]—, the book “ratifies axiologically various texts through a set of readings and interpretations”68.

The pages on Petre Pandrea reveal the encyclopaedic profile of this personality; Pandrea excelled in culture, philosophy, law, criminology, judicial psychoanalysis, in the study of the “Oltenian person”, a.o. As Ion Dur states, P. Pandrea “had a truly interesting biography of a Valachian mandarin, just to use one of his favourite terms, in which the common periods alternate with those doused with serendipity, frustration, penance and, why not, rebelliousness”59.

In the middle part of his work, Ion Dur as a “guide critic”, analyses books of both consecrated authors and of debutants, like: Al. Surdu, I. Hotico, M. Nencescu, G. Hasmațuchi, L. Grozea, T.A. Vidam, C. Necula, I. D. Sîrbu, L. Mânzat, M.– G. Stânișor, R. Stănese, R. Enache and M. Aiftincă. Along these exeques, the critic is also adding an essay about media and a few reflections on the confrontation with the original manuscript of Amurgul gândurilor [The Twilight of Thoughts] by Emil Cioran.

In the end of his book, the diarist is giving testimony of one of the most tragic events in his life: “27 April 2016. It is Wednesday, The Holy Week. My wife’s heart has ceased to beat. Doina – or Zgrăbuță [Small mole], as I was nicknaming her, died after about five days of unbearable ordeal, as it usually goes with any incurable disease”60. The diary goes on with illustrations of other events relevant to a period in which Ion Dur had to go through a partially possible experience of resignation and through feelings that brought him closer to Job, a model of spiritual re-establishment.

Critica judecății de gust [Critique of the Judgement of Taste] is undoubtedly “a joy-book”61.

“Ion Dur always carries his «self» with him”

Jurnal(ul) domestic: 1971-2017: Însemnările unui in-formator [Domestic Diary. The Notes of an In-Form-er] extends beyond 45 years. The book starts with a “Propedeutic”: “If opened with a desire to find into literature, literarised life or sensationalism, this diary ought better to be closed back again. [...] For this is a diary in which autobiography meddles parsimoniously with my personal life and with its intimacy, as much as my pen or my mouse was ready to pin down, and it is at the same time a journal of ideas, which is, I think, its most resilient part and, why not, probably the most interesting one, because it is trying the hardest to evade the weight of time and to be reactive in the face of a mental and cultural eon”63.

Ion Dur is inviting his readers into the maze of his life, through three main entrances: “Isarlîc fără sic (Între perfectul simplu şi perfectul (des)compus) [Isarlik without Sik - Between the Simple Perfect and the (de)Composed Perfect Tense]”, “Vaşătorul de lumină (Mai mult şi mai puţin ca perfectul)”[The Bearer of Light – The More and Less Perfect Tense], and “Zîlele după Iov”[Days After Job]. The book meets the rigours of authenticity and warns its readers that such reading should not exclude the perspective of becoming: “I did not emerge like Minerva from Jupiter’s head. I became. The oak tree comes first in the shape of an acorn”. Ion Dur maintains that he “was extremely careful with formulations and with faithful transcription”64, yet without affecting “the text’s authenticity”. As for the prejudice associated with “publishing of diaries [solely] posthumously”, the diary writer believes it is “both ridiculous and counterproductive”65.

The becoming of the man Ion Dur, with all his “ups and downs” implied by his life’s itinerary, is thus summarized: “There are life slices that are extremely important to me, with their precariousness (from precarius) and fulfilments, with their ups and downs. My years of high-school, college, love at first sight and marriage, the Oltenian entre-act and, infuriatingly late, my coming to Sibiu, then the tribulations that accompanied my contact with the press, particularly the culture papers; not to overlook my activity as a high-school teacher and then in Sibiu, as a professor, in the academic environment, this one a very favourable river lock, until in the end I became an uncomfortable bloke, to avoid a more aggressive euphemism”66.

Jurnalul domestic [Domestic Diary] has been extensively commented67. Adrian Buzdugan says that this book is a “genuinely personal combination of

67 Philosopher Ion Dur was invited by Constantin Aslam to the show “Wells of Philosophy”, edition of 6 July 2018, on the topic “From the Own Self to the Broad Self. Critical Reflections on Philosophic Diaries”. https://radioromaniacultural.ro/azi-la-radio-the inner and outer self” and Constantin Necula considers it “a fabulous lesson. Of a live culture, crafted and thought about. And of love. In a Paulinic way, he is telling us how he learned that love never fails. And I believe him. Deeply. Sensibly. Further, he comments that Ion Dur’s becoming happened between “two poles of recollection: “Doina (Zgrabunță), his loving, discreet and luminous Lady. And Constantin Noica, his cultural trainer, his rope ladder by which he sealed his cultural Heaven”70. And Andrei Ileni particularly noted the fact that “Ion Dur’s domestic diary is not «domesticated» (in the Diary)”71. While Sorin Lavric analysed the diary from the assumption that Ion Dur is an “adiabatic man”, “in whose mind along time there was enough place for two obsessions only: his passion for philosophy and his love for a woman”72.

To Radu Vancu, “[Ion Dur’s] Diary is the exercise of a man who structurally is unable of confession; there is in him a sense of shame, a reticence in showing himself; that simply stops him from including the impure matters of everyday life in the diary”73, yet beyond this objection, the commentator considers “the diary truly remarkable”. R. Vancu emphasizes other aspects as well, that make the book an interesting read, such as the way in which Ion Dur places himself face to face with alterity, a relation that generates the confessions of his own self; where the philosopher, by help of a “crooked confessionism”, writes about his wife “with highest emotional participation”, or where he talks about others, in fact “he unawarely talks about himself”.

Horia Vicențiu Pătrașcu writes enthusiastically about the book, especially because it is “a philosopher’s diary”\(^74\). The essayist interprets the diary, eliminating any suspicion about a possible meddling with and distortion of the related facts by the author himself: “Ion Dur always carries his «self» with him, and this is why his diary is, as I strongly think, an authentic diary”\(^75\). Unlike other similar trials, Jurnalul domestic [The Domestic Diary] does not only offer the occasion for meditations on the theme of love, but is in itself “the narration of a beautiful love story, whose sole character is Doina, alias «Zgrăbunță»”. By comparing him to the philosopher from Păltiniș [Noica], a spirit with such a decisive role on Dur’s philosophic destiny, H. V. Pătrașcu states that “Ion Dur assimilates Noica, yet keeping a certain distance to him, which gives him freedom to elaborate his sober and context-based comments”\(^76\).

It has also been said about Ion Dur that he performed “an act of great courage”\(^77\) by publishing the Jurnalul domestic [Domestic Diary] during his lifetime, because he assumed “the enormous ever-present risk of exposing oneself as prey to the whimsical receptions and interpretations of others”\(^78\). However, M. Sălcudean doubts the discursive authenticity and maintains that with Ion Dur “autobiographical writing displays a tone of re-remembrance rather than of a proper diary [...] Practically, the older notes, «egographies in nuce», as the author calls them, have been revisited and corrected, in view of publication”\(^79\). Somehow in the same vein of interpretation, Victoria Murărescu-Guțan considers the diary to be “a retrieving book of an embellished sincerity”\(^80\).

Whether these statements, casting doubt over the diary writer’s sincerity are right or not, is not the time and place here and now to debate. Still, the philosopher can be granted a right to defend himself, just as he does it in “Propedeutică”: “And then I turn back and ask all those purists: why and for what reason should we refuse to our spirit to salvage from oblivion (for it is oblivion, not amnesia, which is pathological), while transcribing the diary, certain emotion-images that have survived, why and for what reason must we resist this natural right of our mind to a truth as complete and completing as possible?! Only so, I believe, by re-knowledge, can we recover as much and as faithful as possible our past, and we can, by writing, take possession of it”

Conclusions

Ion Dur’s writings have conquered a significant place from the very beginning, yet the essayist’s success did not come out of the blue, but rather after a long-time collaboration with prestigious journals from all over the country. From 1981 until his publishing debut in 1992, the philosopher has published dozens of articles. Aside from the good organisation of ideas and the pertinent nature of his judgements, the chroniclers of his books have praised the amplitude of his documentation. Being permanently guided by aesthetic criteria and by methods that enabled him to reach right into the essence of cultural and political phenomena, but also in the “insides” of some philosophers’ thinking, he has very often succeeded in providing insights into the core of their conceptions. By removing the interference of ideologies from the syllogisms of interpretation, the hermeneut has not only re-signified, but also broadened the exegetic field of many philosophic works or journalistic corpus. It will suffice to mention the minutely performed analyses of texts by M. Eminescu, I.L. Caragiale, O. Goga, M. Vulcănescu, C. Noica, E. Cioran and many others. And in this year’s appearing books, the critic is recovering theorist Vasile Băncilă and journalist Horia Stamatu from the “poste restante”, the latter being an opener of an essential chapter for the Romanian exile journalism.

Having permanently been anchored in the act of critique and in the world of ideas, Ion Dur has also stood out as a true “guide critic”. As a subtle observer of cultural tendencies, often signalling deviations, he has repeatedly proposed to harmonize the three factors that determine cultural progress: the author, the critic and the reader. The hermeneut has built bridges between generations and ages, has come forth to meet the hopeful young generation, giving them hints on their value and revealing to them the creative possibilities coiled inside their spiritual structure.

Ion Dur’s writings are undeniable illustrations of cultural openings that equally include Romanian and universal values as well.
