

Did God create man, or did man create God?

Did God or the Gods create us, or is it the other way around, and we created the Gods?

As primitive homo-sapiens, we wanted to understand where we came from, giving birth to many superstitious views and unscientific assumptions that created various versions of Gods, and the Gods were not always as we know them today!

In some cases, humans claimed to be the Gods and the creators of everything that people had. Although the human in the role of God was most likely aware that he was no God, claiming to be God was the means of ruling over people. Furthermore, have people appreciate the Human God with taxes, labor and thank him for all they had, but then came those who represented or produced other Gods with a different set of rules.

It seems like the aristocracies of that time were the Gods until some other people brought the new Gods to people as a counter strike against the Human Gods or as a protest against the old system and in defiance of old Human Gods.

Nevertheless, one may wonder if today's homo-sapiens are any more intelligent than the primitive ones? The primitive ones' God was at least something physical such as humans, stars, moons, statues, or any other form!

At least, they believed in what they could see, but today, we firmly believe in what we cannot see because most physical Gods were simple to refute, and they were too inconsistent, and the physical Gods lost their places to the new supreme and mighty Gods that cannot even be seen.

The new Gods we created are omnipotent, omniscient, benevolent, and closer to us than anyone else. He is always present, and he is everywhere. However, with all that, no one can still see him! We should naturally wonder why that is?

The previous Gods did not seem to have that much power, but people could see them and believe in them or reject them. However, today's Gods have all sorts of claims but zero evidence to back up their claims.

These new Gods are so powerful and wise but incapable or not daring enough to show their faces for once and prove their own existence at first, then claiming that they created everything. If so, why can't they prove their own existence unless they are made up and false, and the God that we know today is even less visible and less capable than the previous versions of God or Gods?

This God, not only is nowhere to be seen but yet heatedly claims to be everywhere!

The sun or the moon both appear more competent than the new Gods. The sun is visible, brings us light, and is responsible for the circle of life on the planet. Without the sun's heat and light, life on Earth would not exist. It never claims anything, it never says but always shows, never claims but always proves. Furthermore, The sun does not ask us to worship him and not demand our money to subsist.

The sun is more Godly than most Gods of this era. One must wonder how prophets and religions could have successfully convinced and persuaded people that God is the most potent and constantly present entity. However, yet no one can ever see him. Nevertheless, he sends us messengers to make sure that we believe that he is there and everywhere at the same time! So, if God is so powerful and always present, why is he so incompetent to prove his existence? To be present everywhere simultaneously, God must be so great and magnificent; however, how come no one can see such a magnificent thing except for a few so-called messengers.

Moreover, why does he allegedly rely on sending messengers to persuade people to believe in him and his existence? That begs the question of 'are not the prophets and messengers homo-sapiens the same as the rest of us?'

Accordingly, if the prophets claimed to have seen and talked to God, then we could conclude that after all, the rest of the homo-sapiens should be capable of seeing and talking to God as well. Hence if the Gods could speak with their messengers, why don't they take advantage of their eternal presence and speak directly to every one of us to believe in them? If he was a true God, why does he need other humans such as messengers and prophets to convince other humans to believe in him!

Why does he even care if the creatures know that he has made them? Unless there are other Gods and there is a competition for recognition between the Gods. It appears that every God is trying to take credit for the creation of humans and their world. When we think about it, it seems to be an identical scenario; each religion promotes their God as the true God and preaches their God's teachings, and wants us to believe in their Gods. In contrast, their Gods are incapable of proving their own existence to anyone else beyond the claims of messengers and prophets alike.

Only the messengers and prophets declared to have seen or talked to God. Therefore, those prophets were either lying and deceiving people for their own benefits and purposes.

Alternatively, they were genuinely delusional and believed they could see and talk to God, and some chose to believe them. Moreover, the third group of prophets or messengers never claimed to have seen the Gods or represented themselves as the prophets. However, because of their original idea and approach to life and nature and combined with their unique views at the time of occurrence, they became known as wise men or teachers. Over time, after their death, some began being called prophets serving on behalf of some God. Rather than crediting the wise man for his wisdom, they credited some unseen and made up God for his creation and called him the one from God. At the same time, if the same so-called prophet were alive today, he would have disagreed with the notion of being a prophet, let alone believing in the God that he allegedly served and represented.

Some teachers became the victims of religions, and their teachings were not meant to create a God but rather to share their pieces of knowledge with others. Some took the lessons to heart for further growth. Some stole them and profited from those teachings and, over time, created a religion that its so-called primary prophet never knew that even existed, let alone represent it.
